Is there any standard for how to name attributes in select lists? I'm particularly concerned about the list elements that you click on as you are building the list dynamically - some may have an obvious name, others do not. Is it better practice to add a custom attribute to the option element and then make the click event handler look for the value of that attribute to select the option? A: There is no formal standard, though I can't imagine what you would use an option to select from in a typical form. You probably wouldn't be able to specify values for the attributes: `$('.fruits').click(function() { alert(this.value); });` You would want to design your forms to make it easy to select values, with meaningful names: `$('.fruits').click(function() { alert 2d92e491b`
