To evaluate the values of results of two methods for quantifying polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) in human plasma and serum samples by gas chromatography-mass spectrometry (GC-MS) as well as their corresponding reference methods. The study used 25 human plasma and serum samples from the Guangzhou Blood Center collected from March to September in 2010. A total of 25 plasma and serum samples were randomly selected from the pool of blood samples collected at the Guangzhou Blood Center, and they were processed by using two different methods for quantifying PCBs (method A and method B). The analytes in the GC-MS system were identified by comparing the mass spectra with the mass spectra of authentic PCB standards. The results of the two methods were compared with the reference method (method C). Method A has successfully identified all the analytes in the 25 plasma and serum samples. Both methods A and B were comparable to the reference method in terms of precision, accuracy, and recovery rate, except for the bromine containing compound 2,4,5,2',4',5'-pentachlorobiphenyl (PCB 169) in the serum samples. The limit of detection for the analytes in the 25 plasma and serum samples with method A was better than that with method B. The recoveries of method A were all higher than those of method B for the analytes in the 25 plasma and serum samples. Method A is convenient and sensitive to measure PCBs in plasma and serum. It is recommended as a good alternative method to method B for the analysis of PCBs.If something's worth doing, it's worth doing right, so the saying goes. And that is why I have decided to invest the thousands of dollars it has cost me to build my own pool. As a kid, I loved swimming. My life was determined by two things: athletic ability, and my swimming ability. I was captain of my high school swim team and have been back there ever since. My wife, Carol, and I also love to water-ski and take cruises to the
