I'm doing some number crunching with a (as of yet) finite number of operations. How do I determine whether or not the error was detected? Are there any intrinsic methods? Are there any methods for determining whether a division by zero error will (and has) occurred? Is there a table/chart of how many 'detections' occur based on number of operations? (For example, if I divide by 0.5 once, is that a detection? If I divide by 0.5 eight times, is that a detection? If I divide by 0.5 one hundred times, is that a detection? If I divide by 0.5 once, is that an undetected error? I need to do the math to determine how many detections there are.) Sorry for the long-winded question, but I'm not sure where to begin with this problem. I need a way to determine how many times a division by zero error is 'detected'. Thank you for your help. A: From If the result of an arithmetic operation is a zero, a runtime exception of class ArithmeticException is thrown, which means a div by zero is one of the exceptions of the class, so it is detected. Saturday, February 15, 2008 Last week was a good one for our family. On Valentine's day we went out for dinner for the first time since we moved here last July. I went to a Chinese restaurant with the girls and Ethan had a pizza and watched a movie. That night he was trying to make reservations for the girls to go ice skating on Monday and they got a 5:30 call from the rink. We are going to be a winter family this year and I love it! Saturday, February 08, 2008 On Sunday Ethan had two friends come over to play for a few hours. Ethan is in a soccer league with his friends so they played a few games together. I
