You can find one of the farmers here most every day if you look. We can shop, grab a coffee and see what's up with the day's happenings at the local farmers market. All the farmers are here and there's a general conviviality among them. Their products and they themselves are examples of the increasingly diverse world we live in. When we first moved to our neighborhood, we came from places where the usual, although small in scope, assortment of people would include representatives of at least three of the following: white (and/or middle class), black (and/or working class) and Latino/Hispanic. The mix may have not been as distinct as it is today, but the gulf between those groups was never really very wide. No one here is underwhelmed by the variety of people that fill this plaza, and it's the norm that no one cares if someone else is from a different place and isn't a local. There's plenty of room for them to be who they are without feeling like they're under any type of pressure to hide it. When I was a teen, I thought of myself as a cross-dresser. I wore women's clothes, struggled to maintain the appearance of femininity d4474df7b8
