. . [sic] and square proportionate. Thus, they can be viewed as a representation of the plant. The fact that [the plant] is not as originally envisioned and finished does not mean that it is not a representation. The discrepancy is in the use of the Coakley etch pattern. The towers and conveyor are at correct scale with other towers and conveyors in the work. The towers do not have the variation in height in the angles as in the work. The conveyor sits on a floor that is not a floor, but a puddled surface. There is also a drum, but this drum is not square in shape, and is not the type of drum that I have associated with this particular plant. The arches in the towers do not cross above the conveyor, but are straight across and parallel to the conveyor. In addition, the amount of detail in the towers does not match the amount of detail of the towers in the work. If the towers are not correctly identified as a representation of a plant, then there is nothing about the work of sculpture that makes this sculpture a representation of a plant. In addition, although there is a drum, the drum does not seem to be associated with the plant at Duluth. The still unfinished coke plant was installed in the CETA Art Collection by the CETA. The title of the still unfinished coke plant was John . . . Coakley. (Id. at 16-18 (citations omitted).) 5. We note that, contrary to Chevron's argument, the trial court's findings that "the design of the still... was a major part of the CETA and the GBCA's rationale for acquiring it," (id. at 8 (citation omitted)) and that "the design of the still... was based in large part on the design of the already finished coke plant," (id.) are supported by competent, substantial evidence. C 27 The district court concluded that "Chevron did not commit a breach of contract by refusing to execute a second covenant not to compete in the exact same form as the agreement for the first covenant not to compete." (Id. at 9.) It reached this conclusion based on its reading of the contract and on its findings that the district court's interpretation of the contract was reasonable and that "[e] f3e1b3768c
