USB Raptor is a small, easy-to-use application for protecting your computer from unauthorized use. This tool allows you to block access to your computer using a USB key. You can configure the application to allow access using a key, a combination of keys or through a password. Here's a collection of the reasons why this particular party isn't going to happen; it really is that easy. The world is not a nice, pleasant place, and things are not going to get better just by wishing them so – but we should never be so distracted by the terrifying environment that we forget there are still some good things out there, and one of those good things is football. More Premier League than ever The Premier League has turned its attention to the Asian market. In particular, the Chinese market. Partly that's down to recent foreign ownership laws being relaxed to allow any Chinese company to buy an English club. Most of it, though, is because of economics. Chinese companies are way better at investing football clubs than British ones, and people in China want football. There is a huge number of people there who would love to have a club of their own (although not one in the Premier League, natch). That means that the Premier League is taking full advantage of this by creating as much football content in Chinese as possible; the newest series of Premier League games, for instance, was almost entirely translated into Mandarin, and only spoken with an English voiceover. Football isn't quite as popular in China as other sports, but it's definitely a major focus for the league, and it's a huge source of revenue. Let's be honest, the Asian market is big news for the Premier League at the moment. Cigarettes and alcohol The Premier League is Big Tobacco's bread and butter. Media rights contracts can be worth thousands of pounds, and England is one of the few countries in the world where people continue to play football, and have the money to go out and watch it. The Premier League contributes significantly to that. If you are a small club in the Premier League, there's a good chance that the income generated from selling your shirt or your beers is the primary source of income for your club. That said, the Premier League does have its problems – they're one of the only major sports leagues to use tobacco advertising, and the behaviour and impact of smoking on health
