Central nervous system effects of corticosteroids. The recent literature has brought to light the important role of neuro-adaptive responses in the central nervous system (CNS) during the development of cerebral edema associated with increased intracranial pressure (ICP) and the pathogenesis of secondary cerebral edema in acute brain injury. In this article, the authors review the findings on the effects of corticosteroids on the brain and the body during increased ICP. After analysis of case reports and clinical trials of corticosteroids for the treatment of brain edema, data indicate that corticosteroid therapy (prednisolone) is not beneficial in the management of increased ICP. Corticosteroids may inhibit the adenosine-mediated inhibitory response and thereby cause a hyperemic cerebral state. Unlike systemic corticosteroids, the local concentration of steroids and the type of receptor are important in determining the nature of the response. Corticosteroid therapy may affect the brain in other ways, such as by altering cell membranes and ionic pumps, but the clinical significance of these effects is unknown. Adverse side effects include psychosis, adrenal suppression, and electrolyte changes. On the basis of recent data, dexamethasone
