The eel, bristle, annelid, and scaleworm communities associated with the barnacle, Ferriptyyx securinii, were investigated by standard methods in the coastal waters (salinity range 1-31) of the northern Baltic Sea. Species diversity was highest in the lower salinity waters, and lowest in the brackish waters. In the lower salinity waters, many common species and species occurring in low numbers were dominant; in the higher salinity waters these species were replaced by other less common species. Only a few species appeared to be restricted to the highly saline salinity zone. The eel assemblages consisted of 8 species, most of which were sensitive to the lower salinities of the environment. Gobiidae were dominant in the brackish zone, and were replaced by Diaphanosoma sp., Hydrocleidae, and Terga sp. in the deeper waters of the North Sea. The eel assemblages are better known and are easier to collect than the bristle and annelid communities, and the species composition of the two communities was
