Sex- and age-specific mortality, incidence, and survival rates in the United States using the 2000 Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System. The most current information on the magnitude of sex- and age-specific mortality, incidence, and survival in the US population is desirable to guide the allocation of health resources and to inform public health policy. This article describes an analysis of sex- and age-specific mortality, incidence, and survival using 1990 and 2000 Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System (BRFSS) data. We also examined secular trends in mortality in the context of age group subgroups and variation in mortality patterns among the states. The findings indicate that sex- and age-specific death rates have generally declined in the US population since 1990, but the differences in mortality decline among the various population subgroups have increased. While the all-cause death rates declined for all age groups since 1990, sex-specific decline did not attain the same magnitude as the decline for males in most age groups. Although the age-adjusted death rates for females had the greatest net decline from 1990 to 2000, the age-specific mortality rates generally showed a peak at ages 30-39, especially for males, and so the discrepancy in mortality patterns and declines between sexes may be accounted for by the greater mortality incidence at middle age in males. The incidence of illness did not appreciably differ between the sexes, although the mortality rates from a chronic disease such as heart disease are considerably higher in males than females. The incidence of illness and the survival from illness in the United States did not demonstrate as dramatic a sex differential as mortality. The death rates, incidence, and survival rates each have sex- and age-specific patterns that must be considered in efforts to understand the overall health of the population.
