A FEW weeks ago, the anniversary of the attack on Pearl Harbor passed unnoticed by most people. Yet it was a significant occasion for the Imperial Japanese Navy, a bit neglected for four years because of the distractions of the war, and now it was coming round again. This was the first year, it was realised, in which the Japanese had entered the war against the United States with a full bomber force, and Admiral Yamamoto had as yet shown no sign of wanting to attack Hawaii itself. So when, on this Sunday morning of 7 December, the Japanese carrier force came steaming into Pearl Harbor, the great admiral's thoughts may well have turned to trade. "That looks like your best customers," he was not expected to have commented. It was not the first time that he had asked himself the same question. One of the greatest challenges of the Pacific war was to find a place for the battle-worthiness of America's most advanced warships. The American navy, for its part, had to balance the competing demands of protection against attack and counterattack against the Japanese, and the creation of a force with enough strength to do both. In the early months of the war it was a hard case. The combination of plain old age and absence from world events had made it difficult to observe what went on in far-off Japan. American naval planners got their first look at the enemy in October 1941, when the carrier Shokaku, the world's most modern and a war prize in the making, came to Hawaii and was.
