work options. People with disabilities are not explicitly listed, but this seems to be the general “it’s your problem” attitude in most of the developed world. I feel bad for the kids who get handed a shitty, overpriced education that wouldn’t work for most of them. I feel bad for parents who have to listen to their kids go on and on about being “special snowflakes” that they are too sensitive for the meaningless media and texting. Maybe it’s because I’m a middle aged guy, and I’m trying to imagine how I’d feel if my kid were being treated like this and I didn’t have a choice. Having a 19% graduation rate at a prestigious university is a bad thing. If you were one of those with very little intellectual ability, it would be completely understandable. But you weren’t, and it’s simply not a good idea to have someone with so many resources at their disposal deciding who’s worth educating. It’s hard for me to get mad at the people who are most likely to have the greatest difficulty securing a degree. In an ideal world, we’d do a better job of trying to find a balance between accepting that someone with a disability will likely have a hard time getting a great education because we haven’t tried nearly enough to give them that education, and the need to protect the school system so it doesn’t have to do a whole heck of a lot to accommodate someone. Because at the end of the day, it just isn’t a good idea to treat someone like a fish in a barrel. A. I don’t mean that they’re “getting what they deserve”... but that they’re not getting a fair shake. Which is to say that, under American law, you have the right to the education that society can offer and pay for (with a reasonable measure of real dollars, not the “America isn’t what it used to be” mentality) — and if you can’t afford that, you’re left to fend for yourself. Because if there’s one thing I know about disabled people, it’s that we don’t want charity. We want more than we are getting, not less. It’s what we’ve been trying
