Adobe Photoshop CC 2019 v22.1 with crack.If you thought the bus drivers and transit advocates were riled up last year when Metro hired a $40,000 consultant to come up with ways to save money, you ain't seen nothing. After hiring the consulting firm, Access Economics, last summer, Metro is now in the process of developing a new fare policy. One of the more dramatic proposals floated by the agency: phasing out all transfers, eliminating free fare for kids on the bus. While such proposals are certainly worthy of consideration, they will only be effective if implemented in the long-term. To that end, Metro officials are kicking off the consultation process tomorrow. Here is the pitch: "Metro is seeking public input on plans for new fares, fares that include no free transfers, increased fares, transit funding and financing and an area development plan." You have until Wednesday to submit your thoughts and ideas. Here is the form. We've got to take issue with the idea of eliminating free transfers from the system. Sure, we all want to save money. But before we make a big priority out of that, we ought to be thinking about what a transit system with no transfers will look like and the consequences it will have. More costly buses? We've heard that argument before. Eliminating transfers means more fixed costs for the system, and having to pay drivers more. That will lead to less service. More crowded buses? We've heard that too. There are just too many people taking trips. We'll all have to hold onto our fares longer. More climate change? Fewer people will drive, wasting fuel, creating more greenhouse gases, and costing us more money. And as the city has just learned, there are some people who don't want to pay to ride. There are just too many people who drive their cars to the Metro - not to ride public transportation. It creates headaches, it's inconvenient, it
