Hepatitis C virus (HCV) infection is not only a major cause of transfusion-associated hepatitis but also a potentially fatal condition. The source of infection has not been established but, because of the long incubation period, exposure is thought to be from infected blood or blood products. We have evaluated whether there was any difference in the prevalence of HCV infection in haemophiliacs and controls matched for age and sex. One hundred haemophiliacs (fifty-three type A, fifty-seven type B) were compared with one hundred age-matched controls. Sera for antibody detection were available for 94% of haemophiliacs and 91% of controls. The overall prevalence of antibodies to HCV was 5.3% in the haemophiliacs and 3% in the control group (p = 0.46); no 648931e174
